ubiquitously
throughout nature.
Their functions vary broadly across different species and can be directed against bacteria, protozoa, fungi, viruses, and cancer cells. In this review, we focus on AMPs that exhibit direct cytotoxic effects against cancer cells, and in particular, the mechanisms underlying their efficacy in cancer therapy. The cationic charge and amphipathic helix structure are the two prerequisites for antimicrobial peptides to kill bacteria. In contrast, anticancer antimicrobial peptides display diverse mechanisms including binding to cellular components, induction of cell apoptosis, and inhibition of signal transduction pathways to achieve anticancer effects. This review sheds light on the mechanisms through which these peptides kill cancer cells and provides insight into the potential for future development of novel anticancer AMPs. Surgical management of the acute and chronic thyrotoxicosis due to thyroid neoplasms. With the advent of the surgical treatment of hyperthyroidism, attention has been focused on early diagnosis and early cure. Prognosis depends on the extent and severity of the thyrotoxicosis and its preoperative duration. Surgical treatment involves the excision of all neoplastic tissue, and usually includes the radio-iodine therapy to control any residual thyroid tissue. The last years have seen the development of new and improved therapeutic modalities--the most recent being the use of the
